WHEREAS, statistically, there are 15,780 children between birth and 19 years of age diagnosed with cancer in America each year; and one in every 285 American children develop cancer before the age of 20; and

WHEREAS, there has been key breakthroughs in cases of childhood acute lymphoblastic leukemia and pediatric cancer care, there remain many types of childhood cancer with little hope for cure; the majority of children continue to receive chemotherapy drugs and treatment developed from the 1950s to the 1970s and specifically only three new drugs have been approved by the Federal Drug Administration in the last two decades to specifically treat childhood cancer; treatment is intense and generally includes surgery, radiation, and chemotherapy; and

WHEREAS, although there has been tens of millions of funding being allocated towards clinical trial research, there has been very little improvement in the overall survival rate of childhood cancer in the last decade; there are currently more than 380,000 childhood cancer survivors in the United States; and
