Denver's Office of Climate Action, Sustainability and Resiliency (CASR) is entering this contract for assistance with paid, earned social, digital, engagement and event strategies that will amplify the mission and vision of CASR, promote specific programs are services to the community, and connect with Denver residents through innovative means. According to a 2022 survey conducted by the Yale Program on Climate Change Communication, 71% of Denver residents reported being "very worried" or "somewhat worried" about climate change — but 64% percent of Denver residents also said they "rarely" o "never" discussed the subject with their friends and family. Studies have proven that a person's behavior is influenced by what friend and family say and do – social relationships can motivate individuals to change their behaviors. According to multiple studies, the most effective way to implement climate change mitigation behaviors is through social norming and financial incentives. Recent research shows that the best predictor of climate action, over belief in climate change, political orientation and demographics, is whether the individuals believe others are adopting the behavior. This contract will help CASR design and implement communications and marketing strategies to bridge the gap between the high number of Denverites concerned about climate change and those taking or supporting action to solve it. This campaign would establish Denver as a place where people take climate action and drive people to CASR's numerous incentive programs. Sukle and their team will produce and implement an innovative and creative communications and engagement strategy that will inject climate change and climate action more prominently into the public dialogue. The team will use social norming and CASR's existing programs to connect residents to climate solutions while encouraging individual behavior changes as impactful and meaningful.

- Transportation (e.g. buying an electric vehicle or reducing single-occupancy vehicle trips)
- Resource Management (e.g. reducing consumption of single-use plastic or reducing water in landscaping)
- Green Jobs (e.g. encouraging young adults to consider careers in areas where there are known labor shortages, such as electricians)

A successful campaign will:

- Establish a social norm in Denver that people are taking climate action.
- Create trusted messengers to improve the frequency with which people talk about climate action.
- Tackle misinformation around climate action in Denver, including clarifying common misconceptions.
- Utilize best practices in the areas of behavior and climate science to drive climate action.
- Denver residents know that their tax dollars and the City and County of Denver are taking action on climate change.

This full-service marketing team will help CASR drive behavior change, encourage a sense of pride and belonging, and celebrate Denverites as national leaders in local climate action, all with a strong lens toward historically under-resourced communities.
