Nichole Foster's

Pronouns: He/She/They

ancestors are from what is now known as the state of Colorado. After the Land was taken from them, they were forced onto a reservation in the Southwest part of the state to Towaoc, CO. This is where Nichole originates from, Nichole is from the Ute Mountain Ute Tribe and was raised by her mother, who is from the Dine' People. She is the oldest of five siblings, all of whom they are very proud of. Nichole is married to her partner as of 2022, who is an active organizer for Indigenous people and is a member of the Southern Ute Indian Tribe.

Nichole's background and experiences are very broad and detailed. Before they found themselves working for two separate Unions here in Denver, they worked a number of years for her tribe. Nichole worked with tribal membership through our recreation center and Human Resources department, with some of her most important work directing a youth shelter, where she worked with parents and youth to gain the tools needed to maintain their family units.

Later on, Nichole spent some years in college but found their calling after she finished trade school in Tulsa, OK. Nichole moved to Denver in 2016, where she trained and worked for the Boilermaker & Carpenter Locals. As Nichole continued to voice the struggles of her own people, she was also faced with experiencing many other negative encounters as a Queer Woman of Color. This detoured Nichole from continuing their journey as a trade worker. Nichole is excited to be able to join COJWJ and even more enthusiastic about helping create change in the building trades and advocate for the social issues BIPOC queer women face in the trades.
