

Greg has 40-year career in newspapers that was capped by 14 years as editor in chief of The Denver Post, where under his leadership the newspaper won for consecutive Pulitzer Prizes, including for its coverage of the Aurora Theater Shooting in 2012. One of best-known editors in the country, Greg was a co-chair of the Pulitzer Prize Board, where he served as a member for nine years. He also was on the board of the American Society of Newspaper Editors and was an instructor at The Poynter Institute for Media Studies. He joined The Post in 2002 and led the newsroom during a time of transition to become one of the best regional newspapers in the United States. He directed coverage of the 2008 Democratic National Convention in Denver, at which Barack Obama accepted his party's nomination for president. Rebuilt the paper's online news operation, created Denver Post TV, a daily video news program, and hired the nation's first marijuana editor at a mainstream news organization after the recreational use of marijuana was legalized in January 2013.

After retiring from The Denver Post, he was brought on as a partner at Deke Digital, a Colorado-based thought leadership company that helps C-suite executives produce and publish op-ed and analysis articles in major newspapers and magazines, including The Los Angeles Times, Wall Street Journal, Time, Newsweek, Fortune, and Forbes. As editor-in-chief, Greg oversaw the creation of over 700 articles between 2017 and spring of 2023, when he left to start his own business. As the founder and CEO of Klowtify, he is committed to helping small and medium sized businesses, especially enterprises led by women and people of color, to get into the thought leadership game to build their brands, elevate their profiles and grow their businesses. The suite of services the company offers includes social media management, communications strategy, and brand enhancement.

Before moving to Denver, Greg worked at The Boston Globe from 1986 to 2002, where he quickly rose through the ranks from city editor to managing editor, a position he held for eight years. At the Globe he supervised virtually every significant local news story during that period, including escalating gang violence in the city, Nelson Mandela's historic visit to Boston in 1990, the controversial Charles Stuart murder case, the Sept. 11, 2001, attacks, in which two Boston jetliners were crashed into the World Trade Center towers. He also initiated the Spotlight investigation that uncovered the pedophile priest scandal in the Catholic Church, which won The Globe a Pulitzer Prize for Public Service in 2003.

Greg began his journalism career in 1976 as a government reporter at The Journal Herald in Dayton, Ohio and then worked at The Plain Dealer in Cleveland where he reported on government and politics. He is a graduate of Ohio Wesleyan University where he earned a BA in journalism and political science. Greg is very involved in public service. He recently served as a co-chair of the transition team for new Denver Mayor Michael Johnston and is a trustee at Boettcher Foundation, the University of Denver, and Polaris, the anti-human trafficking organization in Washington, D.C. He is the recipient of numerous awards, including Robert G. McGruder Award for Media Diversity, Kent State University, 2003; Lifetime Achievement Award from the National Association of Black Journalists; the Benjamin C. Bradlee Editor of the Year Award from the National Press Foundation, Hall of Excellence Inductee, Ohio Foundation of Independent Colleges.