WHEREAS, in 1934, Charles "Poss" Parsons, sports editor of the Denver Post, demonstrated bold leadership and vision by inviting Negro League teams to participate in the tournament, despite the challenges posed by the racial climate of the time, when Colorado's government was significantly influenced by the Ku Klux Klan; and

WHEREAS, the African American Heritage Calendar highlighted important historic moments within the African American community including the impact of the Negro Leagues in Denver; and

WHEREAS, the African American Heritage Calendar was produced and distributed free of charge since 1980 until the early 2000's, serving as an important cultural and historical resource; and

WHEREAS, the African American Heritage Calendar was widely recognized for its excellence, winning 17 Communications Excellence in Black Advertising (CEBA) awards and receiving national recognition, including a feature on the Today Show; and

WHEREAS, these initiatives exemplify a dedication to education, cultural preservation, and the recognition of African American achievements in history, sports, and beyond; and

WHEREAS, the calendar's impact grew significantly, expanding from its original 3,000 copies distributed across metro Denver to an impressive 90,000 calendars shipped nationwide each year; and

WHEREAS, building on Denver’s reputation as a champion for both baseball and civil rights; In 2021, Major League Baseball moved the All-Star Game out of Atlanta to Denver in response to a Georgia law that many believed would make it more difficult for minorities, particularly African Americans, to vote; and
