Type and Scope of services to be performed: The continued spread of Emerald Ash Borer along the front range has confirmed EAB as an established threat to the Metro Denver urban forest that will continue to impact hundreds of thousands of property owners across the Front Range of Colorado. Denver has an estimated 330,000 ash trees, a large and important portion of the City's urban tree canopy. EAB has the potential to destroy more of Denver's urban forest than any other disease or pestilence in history. Loss of these trees will have adverse economic, environmental, and social impacts on the community. EAB has not yet been detected within Denver and preventive ash tree treatments have been very effective in other regions of the country with EAB infestations. The Office of the City Forester has identified significant ash trees within park areas and public rights-of-way that have been, and continue to be, treated to prevent infestation
